■ ■ ■ In December New York Michael Williams and his wife, Linda, were shocked to learn that their son, 16-year-old Michael, had been shot to death in a drive-by shooting at a subway station in the Bronx. The family had been told that Michael was a good boy, a straight-A student, and the only one in his class to receive an academic scholarship. Technically, we're supposed to believe that he was "a good boy" because he was shot in the back, but I'm sure that in our prideful culture we like to believe that our sons are good boys. Michael's death has brought me to the realization that there are no good boys. There are only good people. Even though Michael was a good boy, he was still a boy. And boys are not immune from the pull of the negative influences that surround them.
